

Home > Features > Mixed French Harvest Also Means Varied Forecasts

Weekly Newsletter

Mixed French Harvest Also Means Varied Forecasts

© AFP | Harvesting grapes at Château Haut-Brion, Pessac, Bordeaux

Experts begin to take stock.

By AFP / Suzanne Mustacich | Posted Sunday, 28-Oct-2012

There will be some princes to be found, but you may first need to kiss a few toads.

That's the experts' early verdict on the prospects for France's 2012 vintages, after what has been a testing year marred by dismal harvests.

Some regions report remarkable, though scarce, wines, while Bordeaux saw its hopes for another stellar vintage washed away by October rains.

"It was complicated. We were eight to 10 days from a really great vintage," said Stephane Derenoncourt, a consulting winemaker. "There was significant advantage for the merlot and early-ripening terroirs. Pomerol will be magnificent."

It all comes down to grape variety, terroir, and how well the grower managed the crop.

"It's not an easy vintage to describe – there's a lot of variability," said Yann Le Goaster, director of the Federation des Grands Vins de Bordeaux.

Bordeaux's dry white wines, picked well before the rainy spell, show great potential. "I am enchanted by the white wines," said Denis Dubourdieu, consultant and director of Bordeaux's Institute of Wine and Vine Sciences.

But the difficult growing season pushed the harvest for the late-ripening cabernet sauvignon grape – the backbone of Bordeaux's red blend – back into October. Unripe cabernet sauvignon grapes are full of herbaceous and green-pepper aromas.

"This was another abnormal vintage. We had a horribly wet spring, then from mid-July to September 20th, extremely dry. That's complicated," Dubourdieu explained.

Then grey skies opened, and unrelenting downpours had growers racing to collect crops as rot spread.

"It was very intense; there were a lot of grapes picked over eight days," said Jean-Christophe Crachereau, oenologist at the Gironde Chamber of Agriculture.

The growers had reason to rush. Once established in the bunches, rot introduces an enzyme that destroys the fresh, fruity aromas and causes red wine to lose color.

"There was sufficient ripeness in most cases. The pips were ripe, so we don't have bitterness and astringency," said Crachereau. "We were lucky that September was beautiful, with a lot of diurnal variation in temperature. This synthesizes the anthocyanins, which gives a richer color."

However, in Crachereau's view, "It's not an exceptional vintage like 2005, 2009 or 2010. It's not a concentrated wine, but the color is intense and the aromas are intensely fruity and fresh."

The gamble taken this year in Bordeaux is the same everywhere, every year, according to Ithier Bouchard, director of Tariquet, located in Gascony, a few hours from Bordeaux.

"We take the risks to get optimal maturity. It's a risk everywhere. It's a question of saving the harvest in volume, or waiting for ideal maturity and having to sort and lose some volume."

Tariquet produces eight million bottles from 900 hectares. "With the amount of land we have, we can take some risks. We always have something left," Bouchard said.

He added that yields were down in a proportion similar to those of Bordeaux, with estimates ranging from five to 20 percent.

© AFP | Grape-pickers at work in a vineyard near Lugny, Burgundy

But elsewhere in France, marvelous quality and distressingly low yields seem to be the hallmark of this vintage.

"We had a difficult year, with frost in April which hit the early-ripening plots of premier and grand cru, and significantly lower yields," said Didier Segquier, director of William Fevre, the largest grand cru owner in Chablis.

"Then May, June and July were wet. But from mid-July to August we had good weather which delivered grapes in perfect health and excellent ripeness."

As a result, Segquier announced that he was more than satisfied with the quality. "The first vats of wine are showing purity, precision and freshness. It's surprising to have so much freshness given the average, even low, acidity."

Burgundy producers say their wines are often remarkable, but supply is scarce – particularly in the famous Côte de Beaune, with yields down 50 to 70 percent, according to Burgundy Wine Council president Michel Baldassini.

In the south of the appellation, Beaujolais faces the lowest yields in recent memory – down 50 percent.

"Everyone has said they have low or very low yields," said Jean Bourjade, general manager of the Inter-Beaujolais wine council. "But we are happy with the quality. The berries were small, giving stronger, more defined aromas and a better expression of fruit."

Consumers will feel the immediate pinch of low yields when the popular Beaujolais Nouveau hits stores around the planet on November 15th.

"We will be giving priority to our main markets," said Bourjade.

In Champagne, early reports announce an outstanding vintage for bubbly, but yields are down 30 percent from 2011, making them the lowest in 20 years.

"The vines suffered every possible disaster up to the middle of the summer," said Champagne wine board spokesman Thibault Le Mailloux. "We feared the worst, but August turned things around."

Heading south, the Rhône Valley was one of the rare regions to escape nature's vagaries.

"The Rhône region was mainly influenced by a Mediterranean climate, while the rest of France was subject to oceanic influences," explained Michel Chapoutier, vice-president of Inter-Rhône.

"The Rhône harvest went well," added Derenoncourt. "The vintage is very rich, generous and shows beautiful ripeness."

Yields held steady and early tastings show highly expressive, well-balanced wines.

"On initial tasting, our syrahs display pepper, violets and liquorice, with beautifully supple enrobed tannins," said Andre Perret, producer of Condrieu and Saint-Joseph.

< Older Story

8

3

0

Like

Tweet

Newer Story >

Published by Wine-Searcher.com

You might like:

French Say
"Non" to Daily
Glass of Wine

The Curious
Case of
Haut-Brion

Wine Made
Before the French
Revolution Sells
at Auction

Low-Priced
Malbec Wine
May Disappear
From Shelves

And the World's Most Expensive
Wine is...

Write Comment

This page sponsored by:

Recent Stories

Festive Gifts For Wine Lovers

Bring a smile to the face of your favorite wine buff with our holiday gift picks.

By Sam Eichblatt | Posted Wednesday, 05-Dec-2012

Wine Industry Split Over Natural Wine

Arguments rage over the use of the term "natural."

By AFP / Suzanne Mustacich | Posted Saturday, 01-Dec-2012

Argentine Wine Dragged Down By Red Tape

As a tough year for viticulturists draws to a close, Amanda Barnes takes stock.

Posted Monday, 26-Nov-2012

French Producers Set For U.S. Push

French wine-brand owners are hoping the new Vin de France category will boost their fortunes in the American market.

Posted Friday, 16-Nov-2012

Going Out For a Drink in a War Zone

A French bar owner is clinging on to his business in Damascus.

By AFP / Sammy KETZ | Posted Wednesday, 14-Nov-2012

The Battle to Save France's Viticultural Heritage

"When I told the customs officer that I'd planted verdanel he told me it didn't exist, it wasn't in his computer. I told him he wasn't in his computer either and therefore he didn't exist."

By AFP / Emmy Varley | Posted Friday, 02-Nov-2012

Argentine Architects Trailblazers in Winery Design

An architectural firm that is devoted to reflecting Argentina's local culture and natural landscape.

By Amanda Barnes | Posted Saturday, 06-Oct-2012

Resurrecting Riesling at Chateau Ste. Michelle

How did a riesling specialist from Washington State end up producing America's biggest-selling brand under $11?

By W. Blake Gray | Posted Thursday, 01-Nov-2012

Cutting-Edge Architecture Meets Dinosaur Fossils

A family of Argentine winemakers have turned a fossil find to their advantage.

By Amanda Barnes | Posted Saturday, 20-Oct-2012

Sherry Fever Grips New York

Sherry is New York's wine of the moment, says Tyler Colman, a.k.a. Dr Vino.

Posted Wednesday, 17-Oct-2012

French Region Famous For Its Dark Reds Branches Out

Cahors growers are experimenting with white-wine grapes.

By AFP / Dominique Beaujouin | Posted Monday, 15-Oct-2012

Making Friends With Franciacorta

An Italian sparkling wine that deserves a place in the spotlight.

By Patricia Guy | Posted Sunday, 14-Oct-2012

Mastering the Art of Oak Aging

French oak barrels are shipped worldwide in a business worth nearly $400 million a year.

By AFP / Laurent Abadie | Posted Friday, 12-Oct-2012

Art and Vines Make Perfect Marriage

Art works on display in the vineyards of France.

By AFP Laure Brumont with Wine-Searcher staff | Posted Tuesday, 09-Oct-2012